Behavioral strategies were evaluated in the treatment of 64 hyperactive preschool children using a semistructured interview with the parents. The sample was randomly divided into 2 groups. Each group was treated with different behavioral programs. The choice of a behavioral program was made before the beginning of the study according to each child's behavior. The program in the 1st group was aimed at relaxing and decreasing motor activity and the program in the 2nd group was aimed at limiting and decreasing sensory stimulation. The 2 programs were the same except for the means and frequencies of limiting and diminishing sensory stimulation in each program. The programs were administered to the 2 groups for about 3 months. The parents showed that the best results were obtained with the relaxation program with decreasing sensory stimulation and with the program limiting and diminishing sensory stimulation. The parents showed that the oldest children obtained the best results with both programs. The best results with the relaxation program were obtained with those subjects who showed no positive parental behavior during the program in the past. The best results with the f678ea9f9e
